The Houghton House is a house built in two sections. The earlier part which is the east end of the house was built C. 1820 while the west end was built about 1860. The house has a gable roof covered with asphalt shingles with a box cornice at the eaves. The exterior surface of the house has a stucco coating. Across the facade is a one story front porch built during the mid to late 19th century. The house has a stone foundation with full cellar. The cellar reveals a central beam with hewn logs for floor joists resting upon it. The fireplace supports are not arched but are columns of stone, rectangularly shaped on per chimney or fireplace. Each side of the facade of the house has a central entrance. The chief difference between the two different periods of construction is that the older part of the house is built of stone while the newer section is frame with wooden siding beneath the stucco. The door sill to the stone side of the house and the lintel for the cellar entrance are Bort Deposit granite. The door frames on the stone side have a single bead along their inner edge. The stone side has an inside end chimney in each gable end built of brick. The new side has one in its west gable wall. The window sash is 6/6. The house is approximately six bays long by two deep.

There are three old outbuildings; a C. 1830 summer kitchen smokehouse, a bank barn C. 1870 and a corn crib carriage shed combination. 1 of these are of frame construction, mortice and tenon. The timbers for the barn were cut with a circular saw while the others exhibit up and down Marks.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Houghton Farm is important for two reasons. The most obvious is that it has been a productive agricultural enterprise for nearly two hundred years. It also has several outbuildings, used in the farm, which are in excellent condition. The other importance of this farm stems from early reports that the first settlers built their first dwellings on this farm. To the east of the farmhouse is the remains of a stone foundation which could have been connected to one of these early structures.
